Even among the middle classes the system of honorary distinctions is so elaborate that the management of the titles Sir, Mr., and Bag, is almost an art in itself. The author gives an example of our " idiotismos" in this line. Whereas, in French you would write, " Monsieur, e vous annouce l'arrives de M. votre fils. William Johnson, a Paris," in English the correct form is "Sir, I inform you of the acrival of your mister son, William Johnson, at Paris. "On remarreally like his rosbif "bien saignant," When he mers, "leave Mr. Kervigan, "que le mot monsieur. orders it in that gondition it must be purely in the mister, est mis devant le mot sen." These rules of English etiquette, he adds, are very complicated. And the complications increase as drinking oan everes can drink bitter beer with you proceed. "A communer (mambre de la Chambre des Communes) est soulement honorable, henourable, tres-honorable, right honourpubliques : et excessivement honorable, most A nourable, s'il devient ministre, and as to the gristourage, it is, to use the expression of a distinguished member of it, one of those things which no fellow can make out. When he contamplates that aristograpy. Mr. Kervigan is filled with indignation: A country in which "un lore ruind a droit à une pension de trois cents livres wives at Smithfield, or that the Lord Mayor has sterling our l'état," and in which a lord not only the power of life and death over the citizens of sits in court beside the judges, but "on l'absence London. Hew educated Franchmen would talk do coux of at dans certains cas, son litre lui confère le droit d'exercer les tonotions de juge," inepires him with the deepost contempt; and he tells us providence of "le apleen," the notion that the plainly that when the Chartiets carry their point, revenues of Waterloo Bridge depend maiely on or rather points, and Socialism triumphs only a which he says he has just received a osse of two made considerable progress in other branches of young boys who were put in the pillery for playing marbles on Sunday.
